Group Description

Established in 1968, the Biomedical Engineering Society (BMES) is the professional Society for students, faculty, researchers, and industry professionals in biomedical engineering. Since 2002, BMES has been the lead ABET Society accrediting biomedical engineering educational programs. BMES unites innovators across academia, industry, and healthcare who are transforming human health through engineering. Through their leadership in accreditation, publications, scientific meetings, and education, BMES advances the field and supports professional growth.

Attendee Profile

BMES attendees include academic researchers, faculty, and graduate and undergraduate students presenting their latest scientific findings through platform sessions, posters, and competitions. The event also welcomes high school students via the High School Poster Expo, where young researchers share ideas alongside professional scientists. Industry professionals and employers will be present in the exhibit hall and at the Career Fair, designed for connecting innovative BMES talent with leading employers in healthcare and medical technology. The meeting also draws participants from allied disciplines such as healthcare practitioners and regulatory experts, drawn by the interdisciplinary nature of the program.
